The letter from a five-year-old rape victim that shames every police officer: Family's agony as 12-year-old rapist is let off with caution and told: 'Do it with someone your own age next time'

- Couple's five-year-old daughter raped by the 12-year-old son of neighbour
- Told Essex police - what followed was catalogue of blunders and cover-ups
- Three and a half years since the rape family are still waiting for justice
- Family have spent £40,000 in legal fees and the culprit was only cautioned

When Sara and Peter's five-year-old daughter was raped by the 12-year-old son of a close friend, the couple were distraught. Not only had their youngest child's innocence been shattered in the most unspeakable manner, but she had endured a horrendous physical and emotional trauma.

They immediately reported the assault to their local Essex police, in the belief that while they, as a family, would help their child come to terms with her ordeal, the force would pursue her attacker.

But the result was not the prompt conviction they expected. Instead – as documents seen by The Mail on Sunday make all too clear – they have been subjected to an extraordinary catalogue of blunders, cover-ups and betrayals by the officers they trusted to bring the culprit to justice.

It is three and a half years since the rape, and the family are still waiting.

In that time, Peter has been hounded through the courts, and the family have been forced to spend more than £40,000 in legal fees and lost countless thousands in earnings.

One senior officer admitted to the couple that the investigation of the case had been 'piss poor'. Officers wrongly claimed that they had reported the case to the Crown Prosecution Service; omitted having the rapist's name added to the Sex Offenders Register; neglected to take fingerprints, DNA samples or photographs; ignored opportunities to instigate a Section 47 child protection joint investigation with Social Care; and took limited disciplinary action against the officers involved.

And the culprit, who admitted the rape in a taped interview, escaped with nothing more than a youth caution, after being told by one police officer: 'Do it with someone your own age next time.'

'All of those who should have protected our daughter at such a vulnerable age have let her down,' says Sara. 'These people should be held to account. How can we ever have confidence in the police again? They dealt leniently with the rapist yet relentlessly pursued us.'

'Our family's lives have been on hold. I feel like someone pressed the pause button on our lives and has never pressed play again. And our daughter believes no one in authority ever listened to her. Or ever will again.'

Their daughter, now eight, was so distressed at how she was sidelined that she wrote a letter to each of the child abuse officers involved.

Damning: Essex Police Former Chief Inspector Sue Harrison and Deputy Chief Constable Derek Benson have been criticised for their handling of the case

Part of that letter read: 'When I was five something very bad happened and it was your job to make sure he was properly dealt with and punished. But you didn't do your job and you let me down.'

'This makes me sad, upset and angry because I am only a little girl. I am very disappointed (sic) in you. I hope one day soon he gets what he deserves.'

She got no responses.

She had previously asked written questions of Derek Benson, Essex Police Deputy Chief Constable. While Mr Benson replied, apologising, his response did little to convince Peter and Sara they would ever achieve justice.

In a handwritten letter, on Essex Police notepaper – seen by the MoS – he wrote: 'I am very sorry for the mistakes made by Essex Police when we looked in to finding out what had happened to you... I am really sorry that you have had such a horrible experience and I wish you the very best for the future.'

The courts have banned identifying anyone involved – including on social media websites. Sara and Peter's names have been changed.

The little girl's ordeal began in 2011. The parents were friendly with a couple who lived nearby in a small Essex town. The mothers had known each for years and spent time in each others homes; the couples occasionally dined out together.

ONE sunny August afternoon, as Sara explains it, she and her daughter went for lunch at the friend's house. All the children were in and out, playing.

Unbeknown to Sara, her friend's 12-year-old son beckoned her daughter upstairs into his bedroom. There he closed the door and curtains, subjected her to porn on his laptop, then raped her. The next day the little girl told her mum what happened.

'As a parent, nothing can prepare you for the sheer devastation of a moment like that,' Sara says. 'She was very upset because the boy had told her this was a game of husbands and wives and was to be a special secret that she must never tell anyone.'

The victim, now eight, was so distressed at how she was sidelined that she wrote a letter to each of the child abuse officers involved (with original spelling mistakes)

'We have brought up our daughter to know children shouldn't have any secrets from their parents, and she was confused, distressed and crying about that.'

The next day Peter contacted Essex Police Child Abuse Unit.

'My first discussion was with a detective constable who was rude and unhelpful,' says Peter.

'But a sergeant intervined and we agreed my wife would provide a statement regarding our daughter's disclosures.

'Shortly after we returned home from giving the statement, the sergeant telephoned and explained that the boy had admitted everything during a voluntary interview so our little girl would not need to be interviewed and he said he would report the incident to Social Care.

'We thought everything possible was being done. Eventually we found out that this sergeant had refused a strategy meeting with Social Care which would have kick-started a joint child protection investigation for our daughter. His failure to do that had catastrophic results.'

Six weeks later, in November 2011, Sara came home to find an answerphone message from Detective Constable Tracy Bainbridge from Essex Police's Child Abuse Unit. 'She casually stated that the boy who had admitted to raping our daughter had received a youth caution for the offence,' Sara recalls. 'We were absolutely horrified. Somehow, the case had concluded.

'Our daughter had been suffering terribly. At that time we believed she would never recover. She couldn't bear to have her bedroom door closed. She was terrified of seeing her abuser.'

By now Peter and Sara realised their daughter probably couldn't continue living so close to her abuser. Peter went to the friend's house to explain this. And so began another distressing chapter in their ordeal.

Peter says that, though understandably upset, he intended to have a brief conversation which, he hoped, would help to clear the air. He told Essex police of his intention and invited them to send an officer. They declined.

'I had a brief chat at the door with the boy's father but he was extremely angry,' he recalls.

The next day, to Peter's astonishment, Essex Police contacted him as the friend had made a complaint. In February 2012, the couple received a letter from Essex Police warning them both over the alleged harassment of the rapist's father.

Sara, by now struggling to cope, was prescribed antidepressants and became reluctant to leave the house. In March 2012 their daughter was referred to a long-term specialist programme for sexually abused children and began an intensive 18-month programme. A month later, however, as the family were having dinner, police officers arrived at their home.

'I was confronted by two burly officers, one kicked the door and walked into our hallway,' Peter says. 'They announced they were there to arrest me for alleged "harassment without violence" against the rapist's father. I was arrested in front of our children and taken to a marked police car outside. The children were completely distraught. I was eventually released after many hours in a custody cell.'

In the summer of 2012, the rapist and his family moved away. But the harassment case continued. High Court papers were served on Peter, Sara and, unbelievably, on their 15-year-old son. The rapist's parents had sought an injunction to prevent further 'harassment' and damages against the victim's family.

Things were about to get worse still. Essex Police brought criminal proceedings against Peter for the same alleged 'harassment'. In November 2012, Peter received a full acquittal in a crown court.

The couple insisted upon seeing the rape case paperwork – also seen by the MoS – and discovered a catalogue of errors. After much insistence, a meeting was organised with Detective Inspector Jane Glassfield from Essex Police Child Abuse Unit.

During the meeting DI Glassfield told Sara that the CPS had been contacted and it was they who decided it was not in the public interest to proceed with the rape case. 'She said she acted upon their advice and authorised the youth caution.'

This turned out to be untrue.

'We discovered that a youth caution cannot be given for rape – such warnings are intended for low-level crime. Formal written CPS advice must always be sought from a prosecutor in rape cases, but it became clear that such advice had not been sought.'

DI Glassfield also disclosed that the Child Abuse Unit officers had not placed the offender on the Sex Offenders' Register as they should automatically have done.

In early 2013 the Deputy Chief Constable, Derek Benson, authorised Operation Falcon which was to investigate Essex Police officers' conduct in the rape and harassment cases. It was headed by Det Supt Tracy Hawkings and had a team of six investigating officers.

Hawkings confirmed to the parents that a full Section 47 Child Protection Joint Investigation should have been undertaken in the child abuse case with Social Care but hadn't been. She added that the rape investigation was, in her opinion, 'piss poor'.

Hawkings admitted that the matters in relation to the rape case were considered so serious that four Child Abuse Unit officers had been served with gross misconduct notices. Essex Police then voluntarily referred themselves to the IPCC.

During the enquiry, it was established that, on the day the rape offence was reported, two Child Abuse Unit detectives visited the rapist's family at home and invited him to give a voluntary interview.

During the taped interview, the culprit mentioned other friends of his who were committing acts on their siblings, but no action was taken on this. Indeed one Child Abuse Unit officer, DC Paul Alabaster, admitted he told the 12-year-old boy, and always told other young sex offenders, to 'do it with someone your own age next time'.

'The force also admitted that no formal CPS advice had been sought and no file had ever been prepared nor submitted,' says Sara.

'During a meeting with the Regional Chief Crown Prosecutor, we were told that the CPS was "disgusted" at how our case had been dealt with and confirmed that, had the case been presented to them as a formal advice file, as it should have been, they would have formally prosecuted the offender.'

Sara drove to Essex Police headquarters (above) in Chelmsford for a meeting with the force's Assistant Chief Constable, Sue Harrison, but she was unable to spare any time to see the mother

Hawkings wrote her Operation Falcon report during July and August 2013 and then submitted it to the Deputy Chief Constable Derek Benson. Though serious failings were acknowledged, the gross misconduct against all four Child Abuse Unit officers had been downgraded.

An appeal to the IPCC confirmed there would be no more than misconduct meetings for DC Alabaster and DC Bainbridge. By this time DI Glassfield had retired.

'We discovered the culprit had admitted the rape in his taped interview but the officers did not report him for the offence. Thus the Essex Police Child Abuse Unit officers decided to give a caution for rape of a small child without CPS advice. We specifically asked if the failing officers would return to work within the Child Abuse Unit and were assured that this would "absolutely not" happen,' Peter says.

Bainbridge and Alabaster had returned to the Essex Police Child Abuse Unit, where they remain as serving officers.

Bainbridge even announced a party on Facebook to celebrate 'it all being over'.

In a statement, Essex Police confirmed that three officers had been issued with written warnings but refused to comment further.

'Hawkings has now been promoted to Detective Chief Superintendent – Head of Public Protection and the Child Abuse Unit.

'Our family no longer has any faith in law and order nor in justice. For our daughter, there has been none.'

As the victim is now eight and the boy was twelve when told to do it to his own age group, the police should be investigating every rape of girls aged twelve, then thirteen, fourteen and now fifteen. Talk about a licence to kill. This is a licence to harm people for life.

Bad bad boy, promise you won't rape any more 5 year old. "No mummy the police said I should do it with someone my own age, next time." The police are unbelievably inept. I feel very sorry for the family who never received justice. Perhaps they should take out a private prosecution.

This truly beggars belief, and then the police wonder why people have no respect or faith in them and the justice system anymore. There needs to be an urgent review into this case, not only is there a clear danger to women out there who will think himself untouchable and therefore needs appropriately dealing with but there are several police officers who's dereliction of duty brings shame on us all. That poor poor girl, I hope this prompts some justice for her.
